The Rainforest

has long been a symbol of power and mystery, a sacred link between humans and nature. It is also the richest biological incubator on the planet. It supports millions of plants and botanicals, a virtual library of natural invention. In these archives, drugs like quinine, muscle relaxants, steroids and cancer drugs are found. More importantly, there are many remedies still awaiting discovery, including possible remedies for AIDS, cancer, diabetes, arthritis and Alzheimer's.

Used by local healers and the indigenous peoples of the rainforest tribes, these medicinal plants hold many secrets and untold treasures. So alluring is the ancient cures of indigenous medicine men that over 100 pharmaceutical companies and governments are currently funding projects studying the indigenous plant knowledge and the specific botanical remedies used by native healers.

Pictures of the red-eyed tree frog (agalychnis callidryas), nicknamed "leaf frog", are seen all over the world. They have become a "poster child" for botanical rainforest health.

We support botanical research and applaud those involved in botanical exploration.
